SUBJECT: Summary of perceptions for SRV tasking.

1. Perceptions of the site include a semi-open area where there is a large, tall, metallic structure. I get simultaneous feelings of the structure being tall and "modern" with sleek lines and curves, and the opposite feeling that the place is chunky w/lots of squared, sharp corners sticking out. The sleek feeling has a metallic feel about it, and the sharp portion has a feeling about it which feels like rock crystal. There may be two separate structures in the area which I am failing to separate at this time.
2. Inside the structure I find a person who is working on some sort of "samples". This person works with these "samples" by testing, observing, and making judgments about them. He then records data about them.
3. This person is tall, gaunt, serious, and tired, but very dedicated. He seems to have the feeling that all his work is for nothing, mainly because he perceives that it's going nowhere after he finishes it.
4. The "sample" is wrapped up in multiple sheets of paper. The actual sample, itself, has a very thick, viscous consistency. It carries (for both me and the person working on it) a demand for respectful fear and the feelings of "keep your distance" / "don't get it on you" / "don't get contaminated by it." It seems to be oozy brown with red areas in it.
5. The purpose of the sample testing seems to be for preventative medicine, research, study, making a database, and creating records, but there is a definite feeling that it is NOT for learning anything new.
6. RVer's critique: Throughout the session (which was done in spurts between 0720 hrs and 1500 hrs), there were several major interruptions for other tasking. The latter portion of the session contains the major bulk of information which is included in this summary. I have the overall feeling that I was definitely on the proper site, but that I may have began "doorknobing" a portion of that site as a concentrational defense mechanism against the interruptions. I do not have complete faith in the fact that the portion of the site I RVd was the one tasked, but have a very sure feeling that the overall site was
